The concept of urban cultural landscapes is more and more used as the level of amenity in cities is recognised as a lever for attractivity and quality of life.

We inhabit a postmodern city where we are looking for experience, feeling and emotion. This has implications for policy.

Traditional public policy debates have to integrate the need for dissemination of cultural assets and services and for enriching the debate about the beautiful and the ugly. Here, the vision of the urban cultural landscape as an ecosystem may be relevant.
